THE reputation of pharmacy as a trustworthy source of health advice has taken a battering today after consumer group CHOICE released the details of a 'mystery shop' slamming the pharmacy weight loss sector.

In a searing condemnation CHOICE blasted the "lack of training, supervision and in some cases irresponsibility," of the programs, adding that while the diet plans may assist in weight loss, "most fail to deal effectively with the complex broader issues around obesity and overweight, with the so-called highly trained consultants nothing of the sort."

CHOICE sent shoppers to 21 pharmacies offering seven different diet programs, then used an expert independent panel of dietitians and nutritionists to assess the findings.

The report found the majority of consultants didn't assess basic factors such as family medical history, lifestyle, exercise levels, alcohol intake and previous weight loss methods.

All but one of the plans PA09 revamped

DISPENSARY

COMING soon to your bathroom section - a living bathmat.

It's the brainchild of Swiss inventor Nguyen La Chanh, who combined 70 pieces of moss to create the mat which is kept alive by the water that drips from the user's body.

The UK Daily Telegraph reports that it feels soft underfoot, and doesn't smell when it's damp.

"I think this mat would appeal to people who miss a corner of nature in their apartment," said its creator La Chanh, who's looking for a financial backer to help mass produce the new mat.

A MOTORIST in Sweden has been banned from having a personalised numberplate with the letters ADHD on it.

29-year-old Maria Forsberg was told by transport officials that the abbreviation was

"inappropriate" and could offend sufferers of Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder.

Some have slammed the ban as political correctness gone mad.

"Anyone offended by that wouldn't have the attention span to make a complaint anyway," quipped one driver.

HUMAN waste in central Japan has been found to have a very high mineral content.

The mineral in question is gold, with a sewage treatment facility in Nagano extracting 1.89kg of gold per tonne of ash from incinerated sludge - a far higher yield than many gold mines.

An official said the high value poo was probably due to large numbers of precision equipment manufacturers in the area which use the precious metal.
