Blackmores CEO resigns

LISTED complementary medicines company Blackmores has announced the resignation of its Chief Executive Officer and Managing Director Richard Henfrey (pictured) after only 18 months in the top role (PD breaking news yesterday).

Reasons behind the move are sketchy but The Australian Business Review claims its former chair said he resigned when the board decided on significant philosophical changes to the company.

Son of the company founder and largest shareholder Marcus Blackmore said he told the board it was in Henfrey's interest if he didn't feel he was the person "to take us through the next transformation of the business then he should think about resigning, which he has done".

Henfrey joined Blackmores in Apr 2009 and performed a number of key executive roles before being appointed CEO on 17 Aug 2017.

The company has confirmed Henfrey will remain in his current positions while the Board undertakes the search for its new CEO.

Chairman Brent Wallace said, "I would like to thank Richard for his service and leadership of the Group over the last 18 months and for his strong commitment to Blackmores, the industry and our stakeholders over his decade long tenure.

"He has played a pivotal role in the growth of Blackmores and in the industry of complementary medicine overall," Wallace added.

Shares in Blackmores slumped 3.9% yesterday to close at $91.47.

Next generation robotics at APP

AUSTRALIAN innovator of retailing systems and dispensing equipment Demodeks, has teamed up with Belgium-based H-Pharma Meditech to launch the next generation of robotic dispensers into Australia, starting at the Australian Pharmacy Professional Conference (APP), 07-10 Mar at the Gold Coast Convention and Exhibition Centre.

Demodeks MD Bob Metcalfe said, "Pharmacists are acutely aware that simply installing a robotic dispenser is not the 'magic bullet'.

"At Demodeks, we work closely with the dispensing team to understand: the current work flow, where the dispensing business is heading, how the dispensary forms part of the wider pharmacy and how to assist in effectively managing the change."

TWC call to "ovary-act"

OVER the course of some 13 years of coordinating morning teas, cake stalls and other fundraising events, community pharmacy network TerryWhite Chemmart (TWC) has announced it has raised more than $1.35 million for Ovarian Cancer Australia (OCA).

Running with the catchy theme, TWC now calls upon more Australians to "ovary-act".

TWC CEO Anthony White said, "Ovarian cancer is one of the most underfunded cancers in Australia. "It's time for ovary-action."

Throughout Feb, TWC pharmacies

around the country have been holding fundraising activities for Ovarian Cancer Awareness Month including lawn bowls tournaments, cake stalls and more.

RUM to save our food chain

CANBERRA University Professor Ross Thompson (pictured) has reminded the public that unwanted or expired medicines can be returned to any PBS-approved community pharmacy as part of the Return Unwanted Medicines (RUM) project, a system designed to protect our food chain.

Thompson is Chairman of Water Science at the University of Canberra's Institute for Applied Ecology and was quoted in The Melbourne Age.

He warned that pharmaceutical residue contaminating waterways could be impacting on human health as drugs are transferred through the food chain, commenting on data from two recent research projects.

An example from one of the studies cited was that of a platypus living in a stream on Melbourne's fringe found to have received more than half a human dose of antidepressants every day.

Affected fish are quite easily identified, Thompson said.

"We know, for instance, that fish that are treated with antidepressants are brighter coloured, they breed more readily and they're happy little fish.

"But they also aren't anxious enough, so they get predated at a higher rate."

"We have shown in the work in Melbourne that these compounds are finding their way into food chains and getting up into fish," Thompson said.

"People who are then eating those fish will be getting a dose of an active compound."

He expressed particular concern about antibiotics being flushed down the toilet or sink, so they end up in rivers and creeks, where they are ingested by aquatic life.

Antibiotics in waterways have the potential to generate resistant organisms, he warned.

Dispensary Corner

YOGHURT naturally contains many probiotic cultures that strengthen the digestive tract, but as far as we know sculling paint is less beneficial to the bowels.

A 90-year-old grandad has somehow managed to mistakenly drink half a can of paint thinking it was yoghurt, thankfully suffering from no adverse side effects whatsoever - yet.

Alex Stein from New York discovered a half-empty can of green paint at her grandad's place before discovering him in his chair with a mint green mouth.

Naturally she was quick to post a photo of her pop on social media along with the caption: "Sooo my grandpa ate half a quart of paint today thinking it was yogurt... when I say he loves yogurt, he LIVES for yogurt," she posted.

Let's hope he only consumed an undercoat's worth!

MAKING your own snake antivenin is not on every pharmacist's agenda, but if it were, this long distance traveller could have milked it.

Scottish grandmother Moira Boxall returned home from a 14,500 km trip to Australia to discover a skin-shedding snake curled up inside a shoe in her suitcase - yes, snake on a plane.

The SPCA identified the slithery serpent as a non-venomous spotted python and quarantined it in Edinburgh - Boxall has decided not to rush back to Australia.
